From Field to Florist

从田野到花商

Felix James (美) 著

Look at all the flowers.
They are for sale in a flower store.

A person who sells flowers is called a florist.
Where does the florist get all the flowers?

In the morning, farmers cut the flowers they will sell at the market.

They put the cut flowers in their truck.

They take their flowers to the market.

At the market the flowers are kept in buckets full of water.
The water helps keep the flowers fresh.

A photograph of a flower market stall. In the foreground, there are several large pots of colorful flowers, including red, purple, and yellow daisies. Some pots have yellow price tags. In the background, there are more plants, including tall green ones and some in white pots. A green text box is overlaid on the right side of the image.

Florists visit the market.
This is where they get the flowers to sell in their stores.

The florist gets the flowers ready to sell at the store.
Some of the flowers are made up into bunches.

People buy flowers at the flower store.
